Homily from Father James Gilhooley

Aesop tells of a dog with a bone. He crosses a bridge over a stream. He looks at his reflection. He decides it is a second dog with a bigger bone. He goes for the bone. His own falls to the stream's bottom. Now he has no bone. The tenants of today's parable are similar. Because of greed, they lost their jobs.

Some concede Jesus was the greatest man who ever lived. Beyond that they cannot go. However, we must make our choice. Either this man was, and is, the Son of God or else a madman or something worse. (CS Lewis)

The proof of a superior story does not consist in its original telling but rather in how often it's retold. On this count, today's Parable of the Tenants qualifies as world-class. It has been retold countless times for 2,000 years.

The parable was spoken on Tuesday or Wednesday of Holy Week. It is a parable of defiance. (William Barclay)

Christ knows He is about to be assassinated. But He calls the bluff of His murderers. He has no intention of running scared. He is ready for His gunfight at the OK Corral.

In disecting a parable, it is usually a given that it has only one meaning and that modifying clauses are not to be emphasized. But this parable is not in that class. Here each item has a point. Furthermore, no point went over the heads of His audience that day. Nor were the hearers amused. Neither should we be.

Jesus describes a situation not rare in Israel. The nation was as politically and economically troubled as it is today. Wealthy absentee landlords were common. Labor problems abounded. Some tenant-farmers working for low wages declined to pay rents. Rent strikes are not a 21st century invention.

Thus, when the landlord sent his agents and even his son to pick up his rents, the hapless fellows were often abused and even murdered. Christ's audience had read of such incidents in the Jerusalem Times over coffee and bagels. They nodded their heads in understanding.

The vineyard was a stand-in for Israel's people. The owner is God. The farmers are the rulers and priests who run the country. The servants are the prophets down through the centuries. Their murders make up an unbroken obituary column throughout the Scriptures. The son is Jesus the Christ.

The tale tells of God's confidence in people. He loans His land to us. He does not stand over us like a bullying cop nor even a watchful one. He is patient with us too. He sends us not one messenger but many. Even, when we ignore them, He, unlike ourselves, will suffer insults for a long time. A novel's hero says it is not the peace of God that surpasses understanding but rather the pain He is willing to endure from our sins.

But God is not to be trifled with. He is equal parts tremendous lover and exacting judge. The story does warn of a time when God will call in all the chips owed to Him. If we don't make up, the land will be given to others. We will be losers with our noses pressed on the glass looking in at the party.

The Parable of the Tenants tells us what Jesus thought about Himself. The agents who preceded Him were the prophets. Yet, exalted as they were, they were but errand boys. For there is only one Son. He is the Christ. Do you see now it is not enough to say the Nazarene was a great man? One must choose whether He is divine or a madman or something worse.

This parable contains one of the clearest claims Jesus ever made to being an original. He considers Himself miles above the greatest prophet. He is without peer. Language betrays us when we try to speak correctly of Him.

Matthew's Gospel tells us of the sacrifice of Jesus. Even though He knew the outcome, He went to His rendezvous with death with both eyes at full attention. He was not a passive participant in His own destruction. He was not a Billy Budd. Herman Melville, Budd's creator, would laugh at such a comparison. Gary Cooper's role in High Noon fits Him better.

Jesus the Christ is what He was yesterday and will be tomorrow: none other than the Second Person of the Holy Trinity.

The world says to us, "Follow me and fit in." Jesus says, "Follow me and stand out." (Max Lucado) Make your choice.

Jesus does not want us to go where the path may lead. He wants us to go instead where there is no path and leave a trail. (Ralph Waldo Emerson)
