Pope Francis: The globalization of indifference

In July 2013 Pope Francis made a dramatic visit to Lampedusa. This Italian Island, situated quite close to the North African coast, has become a byword for the desperation of refugees and migrants who risk everything to get there in their search for a more secure and prosperous life in the West. During his visit the Pope lamented the 'globalisation of indifference', the turning of our collective blind eyes to the massive social problems of our times. 'We have become used to the suffering of others. It doesn't affect us. It doesn't interest us. It's not our business' he said.

Popes have been saying things like this ever since there have been Popes. But what characterises Francis' focus on the social dimension of the Gospel is his talent for summing up the issues in brief but powerful phrases. The words 'globalization of indifference' draw our attention to our desire to avoid looking at the suffering in the world and also to how globalization has resulted in a moral failure on a global scale, despite its great potential for progress and solidarity. Indifference to suffering, therefore, has become a culture, something commonly accepted and left unquestioned. By naming it in this dramatic way and by his symbolic acts, such as his pilgrimage to Lampedusa, Francis dares to challenge this (Chris Chatteris SJ, National Secretary Apostleship of Prayer, South Africa).
